BACKGROUND

Land and Climate. Covering 38,023 square miles (98,480 square kilometers), South Korea is slightly larger than Indiana. Its only border is shared with North Korea at the 38th parallel, where the Korean Peninsula was divided at the end of World War II. At its closest point, South Korea is 123 miles (196 kilometers) from Japan. Around 65 percent of the land is forested and approximately 20 percent is suitable for cultivation. Hills and mountains dominate the east, while plains are found in the west and south. South Korea's climate is temperate, but high humidity makes summers seem hotter and winters colder. The nation experiences all four seasons; spring and fall are the most pleasant times of the year. The monsoon season is from mid-July to mid-August. During this time, South Korea receives half of its annual rainfall. Korea is traditionally known as Chosŏn ("Land of the Morning Calm").

History. Powerful kingdoms flourished on the Korean Peninsula more than two thousand years ago. Of particular importance were the Koguryŏ (established in 37 B.C.), Paekche (18 B.C.), and Silla (57 B.C.) dynasties. Silla kings united the three warring kingdoms in A.D. 668 and developed a rich Buddhist culture. By 935, the strong, new Koryŏ kingdom had established itself on the peninsula. The name Korea comes from Koryŏ. During the Koryŏ era, the world's first movable metal-type printer was invented. Koryŏ general Yi Sŏng-gye seized power, declared himself king, and established the Chosŏn (or Yi) Dynasty in 1392. The Yi ruled for more than five hundred years. In the latter part of the Yi Dynasty, China and Japan sought control of Korea, a struggle the Japanese eventually won. They annexed Korea in 1910.

At the end of World War II (1945), the Soviet Union entered Korea from the north and the United States entered the south to accept the surrender of Japanese troops. The peninsula was accordingly divided (at the 38th parallel) into two administrative zones. After attempts to hold nationwide elections failed, an independent government was established in the south with U.S. support; Syngman Rhee became president.

In June 1950, North Korean troops invaded South Korea, triggering a three-year war. The United States and United Nations sent troops to help South Korea. Concerned that war might spill into Chinese territory, China sent troops to aid North Korea. The war ravaged the peninsula and ended in a stalemate (a peace treaty still has not been signed), with the original border virtually unchanged. Violent border incidents have occurred over the years, and North Korean soldiers have entered South Korean territory several times.

Rhee resigned in 1960 after student unrest over charges of corruption. Indeed, students have played a vital role in South Korea's democratic evolution. Their demonstrations precipitated a military coup in 1961, and General Park Chung Hee seized power. Elected in 1963, Park implemented some reforms but retained firm control. He was assassinated in 1979. Student demonstrations in Kwangju in 1980 brought down the interim government. Troops sent to halt the demonstrations killed some two hundred students. General Chun Doo Hwan was appointed president. Kwangju became a center for anti-government sentiment, and the slain students are memorialized every year. The economy steadily improved during the 1980s, but political dissent was still tightly controlled. After more mass demonstrations for greater political liberty, Chun stepped down in 1987. General Roh Tae Woo was freely elected that year, and he began instituting reforms that paved the way for civilian rule.

South Korea

In 1992, Kim Young-sam was elected the first civilian to occupy the Blue House (presidential mansion) in more than 30 years. Kim promised to further reform government and to continue economic progress, but he was plagued by scandals, the bankruptcy of the Hanbo Steel Industry Company (South Korea's second largest conglomerate), and the Asian economic crisis of 1997.

Elections in 1997 brought former dissident Kim Dae Jung to power as president in 1998. He implemented a "sunshine policy" of constructive engagement with the North in hopes of eventually achieving reunification. While the goal of reunification has long been espoused on both sides of the border, different visions and deep suspicions keep the two Koreas far apart. Roh Moo-hyun, elected president in 2002, continued diplomacy with North Korea, but the North's recent threats of nuclear weapons development have escalated tensions between the nations.

THE PEOPLE

Population. South Korea's population of 48.3 million is growing annually at a rate of 0.66 percent. About three-fourths of the population lives in urban areas; almost half of the population lives in the greater Seoul area alone. Seoul has more than 10 million residents. Pusan, Taegu, and Inch'on are the next largest cities.

Except for a small Chinese minority, South Korea is an ethnically homogeneous country. However, regionalism divides the population and creates biases and tensions that have impacted politics and social interaction throughout the nation's history. A person's dialect or accent can identify his or her home region. Inter-marriage between regions is relatively uncommon. Political rivalries between leaders from Kyöngsang province and Chölla province are most pronounced. Voters often prefer to elect someone from their own region, regardless of the candidate's qualifications.

Language. The Korean language plays an important role in national identity. It is written in Hangul, a phonetic alphabet created in 1446 because classical Chinese (the only written language available) was difficult to master. Hangul made it possible for the commoner to read and write. It has 24 letters, 10 of which are vowels. Hangul also instilled a national pride in Koreans that helped them preserve their culture during periods of foreign occupation. The Seoul dialect is the standard taught in school. Korean used in South Korea mixes numerous Chinese characters with Hangul script in newspapers and government documents, but Korean is not related to Chinese. Modern Korean has adopted many English and other foreign terms associated with Western culture. English is taught in school and many people can speak it.

Religion. Confucianism permeates all aspects of Korean society, but it is a philosophy and not a religion. It orders social behavior, stressing virtue, morality, and filial piety. Children are expected to show deference to their parents and perform certain duties for them in life and after they die. Confucian rites conducted on behalf of ancestors promote this respect and family unity. Even Christians will perform these cultural rites in honor of their dead. Nearly 50 percent of the population is Christian. Most belong to a variety of Protestant churches.

Roughly one percent of the population engages in Shamanism, including geomancy, divination, avoiding bad luck or omens, warding off evil spirits, and venerating the dead. More than 40 percent of South Koreans are Buddhist, but few regularly attend worship services.

General Attitudes. Korean society is vertically ordered according to tenets of Confucian philosophy. Nearly all interaction is determined by one's place in various social groups or one's status in a relationship. One's status is determined by age, gender, education, family background, wealth, occupation, and/or political ideology. Success depends on social contacts. Koreans often use extreme modesty when speaking about themselves. They are reluctant to accept high honors and graciously deny compliments. Koreans are quick to make friends and they rely on each other for just about anything.

Giving gifts as a means of obtaining favors is common, especially in the workplace, and accepting a gift carries the responsibility of reciprocity. Open criticism and public disagreement are considered inappropriate because they can damage another person's reputation. Out of respect for the feelings of others, Koreans may withhold bad news or adverse opinions or express them in an indirect way. Greater democracy, economic prosperity, and Westernization are changing Korean society for the rising generation. Young people enjoy more material possessions and a broader pop culture than their parents' generation.

Personal Appearance. Most South Koreans, except for the elderly in rural areas, wear Western-style clothing. The youth wear modern fashions, and Korea has an active fashion industry. Clothing often depends on the event. In public, conservative dress is important. Bare feet are inappropriate. In the business world, Western-style suits and dresses are the norm. On special occasions or holidays, however, people often wear a hanbok. For women, a hanbok is a long two-piece dress that is often very colorful. For men, it includes trousers and a loose-fitting jacket or robe.

CUSTOMS AND COURTESIES

Greetings. Within the Confucian social structure, how one is greeted depends on one's age and social standing relative to the greeter. A bow is the traditional greeting, but it is usually accompanied by a handshake between men. As a sign of respect, the left hand may support or rest under the right forearm during the handshake. Women shake hands less often than men do. Professionals meeting for the first time exchange business cards, presenting and accepting the cards with both hands after a handshake. A common greeting between peers or for subordinates is Annyong haseyo? (Are you at peace?). Children often greet each other with a simple Annyong? To show respect for a social superior, one adds an honorific: Annyong hashimnikka? Young children bow or nod when greeting adults, and most adults bow or nod when meeting people other than friends and relatives.

Gestures. Proper courtesy is shown with gestures. Items are passed with both hands or the right hand grasped by the left at the wrist or forearm. Feet are not placed on a desk or chair. When yawning or using a toothpick, one covers the mouth. Koreans beckon by waving the fingers together with the palm down. Beckoning with the index finger is rude. Facial expressions are often more important than body language in communicating unspoken messages. When embarrassed, a person may respond by laughing. Eye contact is important in conversation among peers.

Traditionally, Korean men hold hands or walk with a hand on a friend's shoulder. While this is less common among the younger generation, it is still an important way for men to express informality or friendship. Touching older people or members of the opposite sex is usually inappropriate.

Visiting. Guests invited to a home remove their shoes upon entering. While Western furniture is common, in traditional Korean homes guests are seated on floor cushions that are heated from below (ondol floors). Men sit cross-legged and women tuck their legs to one side behind them. The guest receives the warmest or best position. When visiting relatives, men and women usually separate to socialize. For example, the women gather in the kitchen. Refreshments usually are served, and refusing them is impolite. Guests invited for a meal customarily bring a small gift, often something that can be served at the gathering. Wrapped gifts are not opened in front of the giver. At the end of a visit, the host accompanies the guests to the door or outside. Older South Korean men socialize in Tabang (teahouses).

Eating. South Koreans eat three meals a day, though busy schedules make it difficult for the family to always dine together. Chopsticks and spoons are the most commonly used utensils. At a dinner party, the meal usually is served before socializing begins. People pass items and pour drinks with the right hand, supporting the forearm or wrist with the left hand. In restaurants, tipping is not expected, but the bill usually includes a service charge. Eating while walking on the street is not appropriate for adults.

LIFESTYLE

Family. The family is bound by a strong sense of obligation among its members. The father is the head of the family; he and the oldest son receive the greatest respect. The oldest son is given the best opportunities for education and success. Although women comprise slightly more than half of the labor force, their social status is lower than men's in the workplace and at home. Gender roles are well-defined, but urban women enjoy greater equality with men than do rural women. Mothers supervise the household and children, while men are the primary providers and final decision-makers. Women retain their maiden names when they marry. A Korean name consists of a one-syllable family name followed by a one- or two-syllable given name. Kim, Lee (Yi), and Park (Pak) are the most common family names.

On a person's 60th birthday (a milestone rarely reached in the past), extended family members gather for a grand celebration (hwan'gap). Families may save money for years just to pay for the event. Similar lavish attention is afforded to babies. After one hundred days of life, a small feast is held in honor of the child's survival to that point (also a date often not reached in the past). A much larger celebration (tol) is held at the first birthday. From the many gifts offered, what a child picks up first is thought to signal his or her fortunes in life.

Though Koreans traditionally lived with members of the extended family, it is now more common to live in nuclear family arrangements, especially in urban areas. However, sons still expect to care for their aging parents. Because of the Confucian emphasis on family hierarchies, Koreans keep detailed genealogies. These records date back many centuries and include a person's birth, relations, achievements, and place of burial. In clan gatherings, families that rank higher in the genealogy are treated with greater respect by lower families.

Dating and Marriage. Young South Koreans enjoy going to movies, hiking, taking short trips, meeting at coffee shops, or joining friends at fast-food restaurants. They may meet in karaoke rooms, arcades, or "video rooms" (establishments that show movies on videotape). Couples might hold hands on a date, but kissing in public is not appropriate. While trends are changing, most South Korean youth rarely have time for serious dating before they enter college or the workforce. In some cases, rural families still arrange marriages for couples who have met but not dated in the Western sense. Traditional wedding ceremonies were rather elaborate, but today they often take place in public wedding halls where couples wear Western-style clothing instead of traditional Korean wedding attire.

Diet. Korean food is generally spicy. Rice and kimch'i (a spicy pickled cabbage) are staples at almost every meal. Various soups are common. Rice often is combined with other ingredients, such as red beans or vegetables. Pibimbap is rice mixed with bits of meat and seasoned vegetables. Chicken and beef are common meats. A favorite delicacy is pulkogi, strips of marinated and barbecued beef. Koreans also eat large amounts of fish, seafood (clams, oysters, squid, octopus, sea cucumbers), and ddök (pounded rice cake). Barley tea and soju, a common alcoholic drink, are served with most meals. Magolli, similar to soju, is more popular in rural areas. Fruit is often served as dessert.

Recreation. The most popular spectator sports in South Korea are baseball, basketball, soccer, and volleyball. Some South Koreans swim, play tennis, bowl, or golf. Children enjoy training in taekwōndo (a martial art), and most men have some experience with it from their military service. Badminton, table tennis, and billiards are popular games. Unique to Korea is a form of wrestling called ssrōm, in which contestants hold on to pieces of cloth tied around their opponent's legs during their match. Mountain climbing and hiking are favorite activities for weekends and vacations. Music, television, and video games attract the attention of the youth.

The Arts. Prose, poetry, legends, folktales, and plays were either passed down orally or recorded in the Chinese language until Hangul was developed in the mid-15th century. Poetry was originally performed through song; sijo (an ancient poetic form) has endured in popularity. Themes included Confucian principles, love, and nature, while current renditions also include political topics.

Folk music and dance continue to be popular. P'ansori is sung by a soloist accompanied by drums. Mask dances, drum dances, masked theater (sandae), and puppet theater (kkoktukaksi) are performed at festivals. Movies, art exhibits, and theaters also provide entertainment.

Calligraphy is an important art and has influenced traditional painting. Every brush stroke represents an object in nature. Art forms are distinctly Korean but have been influenced by China as well as Buddhism and Shamanism. The government actively supports and preserves the arts.

Holidays. For the New Year (1–3 Jan.), families gather to exchange gifts, honor the dead, and enjoy large meals. Generally, everyone dresses in traditional clothing. After the memorial services, family members bow to each older person in a show of respect. Games are played and fortunes are told. South Koreans celebrate the Lunar New Year (January or February) by visiting hometowns or vacationing in resorts. The other major family holiday is Ch'usōk (Harvest Moon Festival, held in September or October), when family members visit ancestral tombs to clean the grave site and leave food offerings in honor of the dead. Larger family reunions are common during this festival.

Other holidays include Independence Movement Day (1 Mar.), Children's Day (5 May), Buddha's Birthday (in April or May, observed according to the lunar calendar), Memorial Day (6 June), Constitution Day (17 July), Independence Day

(15 Aug.), National Foundation Day (3 Oct.), and Christmas. Arbor Day (5 Apr.), Armed Forces Day (1 Oct.), and Korean Language Day (9 Oct.) are marked by various celebrations but are not public holidays.

Commerce. Small family-owned stores are usually open every day from early in the morning until 10 or 11 p.m. In many cases, the family lives above or near the store. Larger department stores close by 8 p.m. Other businesses are generally open from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. Banks and government offices close earlier.

SOCIETY

Government. The Republic of Korea has nine provinces (do) and six special cities (jikhalsi). The president (currently Roh Moo-hyun) may only serve one five-year term. The president appoints a prime minister (currently Goh Kun). Though technically head of government, the prime minister is largely a ceremonial figure. The State Council, an executive cabinet, is comprised of the president, the prime minister, and 15 to 30 ministry heads. Members of the 273-seat National Assembly (Kuk Hoe) are directly elected to four-year terms. All citizens may vote at age 20.

Economy. South Korea experienced rapid economic growth after the 1960s to earn a position as one of the Four Dragons of East Asia. In just one generation, South Korea rose from poverty to relative prosperity and the real gross domestic product per capita rose from less than $700 to nearly $12,000. Most families came to identify themselves as part of the middle class. In the late 1990s, strikes, a large budget deficit, political scandals, bankruptcies, and competition from other nations made South Korea vulnerable to the economic crisis that swept Asia. The chaebol (huge conglomerates that dominate the economy) had not followed sound fiscal policies and began to fail. With the economy near collapse, the standard of living fell dramatically. The government has pursued a restructuring campaign that, among other things, is to make the chaebol more responsible. Heavy dependence on international trade has made the economy more vulnerable to global and regional economic downturns. Despite these challenges, the country's economy has continued to grow, often at a high rate.

Chief agricultural products include rice, barley, vegetables, and fish. About 6 percent of South Korea's labor force is in agriculture and lives in rural villages, cultivating small plots or collective farms. Around 40 percent of the labor force works in mining and manufacturing. More than half is involved in service occupations. Major industries include textiles and clothing, chemicals, steel, electronics, and automobiles. The currency is the won (KRW).

Transportation and Communications. Air, rail, and bus connections provide a good transportation network between cities. Roads are paved and in good condition. Buses, private cars, and taxis handle urban transportation. Seoul has an efficient subway and a quality express bus system, in addition to regular buses. Taxis are plentiful and inexpensive. Drivers often will stop for other passengers during busy hours. Driving habits are aggressive and accidents are common. South Korea has many daily newspapers, numerous radio and television stations, and efficient postal and telephone systems.

DEVELOPMENT DATA

Human Dev. Index* rank	30 of 175 countries
Adjusted for women	30 of 144 countries
Real GDP per capita	$15,090
Adult literacy rate	99 percent (male); 96 (female)
Infant mortality rate	7 per 1,000 births
Life expectancy	71 (male); 79 (female)

Education. Education is the most valued aspect of Korean culture, a virtue rooted in Confucianism. It is a key to success, respect, and power. Schooling is compulsory between the ages of six and twelve, and nearly every child completes primary schooling. Most continue to secondary schools, which demand long hours and high performance. To enter a university, applicants must pass extremely competitive and rigorous entrance exams. Students prepare intensively for months to pass exams, often hiring tutors or taking private classes.

Political demonstrations usually occur every spring and are considered part of the students' duty to protect the people against social injustices. Though sometimes violent, these activities have been part of university life for much longer than the republic has existed. However, they have decreased in frequency since 1992.

Health. All segments of the population have access to good health care. The best medical facilities are in Seoul. Care progressed with economic growth; most people now have safe water and adequate nutrition. Nearly all women receive prenatal care and medical attention during delivery. More than 90 percent of all children are immunized.

AT A GLANCE

Events and Trends.

- In February 2004, South Korea participated in six-nation negotiations aimed at convincing North Korea to abandon its program of nuclear weapons development, but no significant progress was made. In addition to South and North Korea, nations at the talks included China, Japan, Russia, and the United States. North Korea had earlier proposed freezing its nuclear weapons program in exchange for economic concessions and security guarantees from the United States. The United States rejected the offer, demanding that North Korea not only freeze its program, but dismantle it altogether.
- South Korea tested its first bullet train in February 2004. The train travels up to 186 miles (300 kilometers) per hour and was built at a cost of $12 billion. It halves travel time between Seoul and Pusan to two and a half hours. The government hopes the new train will ease congestion in Seoul and allow greater development in other regions.
